tant role which the Scriptures play in the life of a missionary. Boniface's letters were filled with scriptural references. Certainly he embodied within his life those qualities which are described in the Scriptures as being Christian virtues. He was humble even though holding the highest church position in his country, affectionate, and self-sacrificing for the many whom he sought to serve. His study of the Scriptures, his prayer life, his passion for righteousness made him one of the most notable men of God in all ages.

The value of Boniface's letters to the new converts must have been very great. Such mass conversions as he obtained made it impossible for him to have a personal relationship with many of these churches. He had won one hundred thousand Germans to Christianity by the year 1739. His correspondents also included the leaders of the church in England and in Rome as he described his work and pointed out some of his needs.

Although an old man, renowned in Germany as one of their greatest missionary leaders, an archbishop of the Roman church, still he left his German home and sought to conduct another missionary crusade among the Frisians in the Low Countries. Here he was set upon by a band of drunken pagans and was killed. The drive of this man's desire to spread the good news of the Kingdom has seldom been matched.

3. Cyril and Methodius

It was by invitation of the Moravian prince, Rostislav, that the two brothers Cyril and Methodius were given opportunity to evangelize among the Slavs. Sons of a prominent citizen of Thessalonica, they became the strongest leaders of the Christian movement among their people. It is indeed significant that even before their missionary work began, they had with others devised an alphabet for the writing of the Slavonic language and had completed the translation of the Gospels into this language.

The use of the Slavonic language in the services of worship aroused opposition on the part of German prelates. The political struggle for power between the various princes also contributed to this friction between these churches. Soon, however it was to be seen that the Latin language of the Roman church was to predominate. This proved to be a restricting factor in the spread of the Roman influence in the East. Do you feel that the church today has adopted practices which limit its appeal and its effectiveness throughout the world?

4. The Taming of the Barbarians

A very fine description of the action of the church in its effort to bring the newly won converts into a uniform belief and practice of religion is given by Walzer. A discussion of these methods might be of great interest as they are interpreted in light of the need of the day in which they arose. What do you think about the church holding "the keys of the Kingdom"? Discuss the merits and weaknesses of penance. What induced the selling of indulgences? What was an indulgence supposed to mean? Why did the converts fear excommunication by the church? What is the Protestant's reaction to these various forms of discipline exercised by the early Church?
